1) Explain the statement "Man is by nature a social animal." given by Aristole. Why are human beings considered social species? Discuss with suitable examples.

- The statement "Man is by nature a social animal" was given by Aristole to explain that human beings naturally seeks the company of others and cannot live a complete life in isolation. According to him, society is not an artificial creation but a natural and necessary condition for human existence. From birth itself, a person depends on others for survival, learning and emotional support. A child cannot grow without the care of parents and family, and even adults rely on others for food, education, protection and employment. Humans processes the power of speech and reasioning, which enables them to communicate, share ideas, and form relationships.
